Growing up is hard. We are saddled with a near impossible set of tasks. We complain the most about the mundane; chores, boredom, overbearing rules to follow. Then there are the expectations thrust upon us by adults: be successful in everything you do, always make the right decisions, carry out things exactly in the way the previous generation did. And then there are the inner struggles of self identity; who are we? And once we figure that out, where does that true version of ourselves fit in..within our family, our friends, so-ciety as a whole... We put that pressure on ourselves, not realizing that most of the people walking this planet are no closer to answering those questions than they were when they first popped into our mind one sleepless night after a rough first day of high school. The reality of just existing is daunting.

There are those select few that do figure out the answer to the “who am i” question early on. But often, that progress only leads to greater tribulations, especially when that self identity doesn’t fit into what is perceived as the societal norm. The things we don’t understand can feel threatening, and teens and adults alike easily fall into the trap of trying to tear down what we see as different.

We’ve been running Bellarine since 2011. Over that time, we’ve had so many teens come across our stage; each unique, each having their own joys, and each dealing with their own struggles. We’ve endeavored to make sure that when anyone walks in, they get to be whoever they want to be, either on stage or off. That’s only possible thanks to the amazing people that have taken part in this project over the past 12 years.

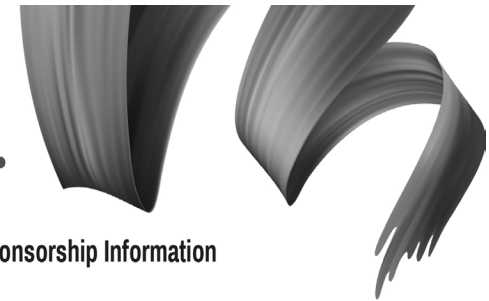

This show has been a joy to put on and I’ve loved watching the cast find their own individual connections to the story. There is something here for everyone, but I’d like to believe there is one consistent message. We all are unique and we all are better off when we recognize that being unique and hoping to be accepted for who we are is what makes us truly the same.

Accept each other, spread the love, and enjoy the show!

The illustration is a tarot card titled "COSMIC TEMPERANCE". The title is written in a large, serif font, arched across the top. The central figure is a sun with a human-like face, wearing a crown and having rays emanating from its head. Below the sun is a crescent moon, a five-pointed star, and three diamonds. The entire scene is set against a background of stars and a dotted line that forms a circular path around the central elements. The illustration is framed by a decorative border with sunburst motifs in the corners.
